

It is said that someone from Sialkot or Khorasan, many years later, is to come across Jabran, a tome of tomes, a world of worlds, containing a description of the knowledge of the world, in computable form, and written in a language understood by them, lived by them, and lived by others as it reads itself, and writes itself, mirror-like, with the waving of the times.